If I have two queries that are identical, except for the name and order of arguments, is it ok to have them under the same name? If so, should the order of the arguments be the same? Or do I need to have both of them under different names? A: No. A query is a single statement. If you have two different statements, there is no way to keep them both together in one document. When you call a query you specify its name (via the WITH clause) and its arguments (via the SET clause). These are all one statement, and all the identifiers must be unique. The order of the SET clauses also does not matter. If you want to have two queries which are identical except for the name and order of arguments, you can wrap them into one statement: WITH new_query AS (SELECT * FROM other_query), different_query AS (SELECT * FROM other_query) SELECT * FROM new_query CROSS JOIN different_query WHERE new_query.a = 1 Background
===== Women are disproportionately affected by HIV infection, with the largest impact on their sexual health. Within the context of primary care, the World Health Organization (WHO) has recommended that the sexual health of women should be included in routine medical consultations. A tool for sexual assessment needs to be reliable and has to be acceptable to women. Methods ===== To develop a rapid assessment tool of the sexual health of women. Four tools were reviewed that were found to have validity and reliability for screening women. They were adapted for routine use in a primary care setting and a decision-making aid tool was developed. The questionnaire was administered to 15 doctors and 13 nurses in rural Uganda. 5b5f913d15

A Winnipeg judge has thrown out a lawsuit against the city for the criminal charges filed against a man who said he was attacked by police. In a written decision made public Wednesday, Justice Maryann Laupin dismissed the claim by Stonewall resident Josh Barrie against the city. The judge found no provisions in the law that would allow him to sue the city. "It is a question of whether there was a criminal offence committed by the police," Laupin wrote. "The petitioner alleges that he was assaulted by the police, which he contends was a breach of his rights under the Criminal Code." A judge had originally thrown out the civil lawsuit in September, but a different judge later ordered a rehearing. Barrie said Wednesday he was "absolutely" surprised by the decision. "The judgment is contrary to the evidence I provided in my claim," he told CBC News. Barrie said he was assaulted on Aug. 4 by officers who responded to an 911 call about a man acting strangely. Barrie said he had acted oddly because he had taken an anti-psychotic medication, and he was in the shower at the time of the incident. In a video that went viral on social media, Barrie said police told him to take off his clothing so they could search him. But, in his written decision, Laupin said the evidence Barrie provided "is not adequate to support his claim that he was subjected to a search incident to arrest." "Mr. Barrie does not establish that the officers had reasonable grounds to believe he was in possession of a weapon, or that he was in possession of anything that could constitute a threat," Laupin wrote. "Indeed, Mr. Barrie has not established that he was either arrested or subjected to a search." In addition to not proving he was assaulted by police, Barrie failed to establish that he had a right to legal representation during a police investigation and a right to face his accuser, the judge wrote. "The Criminal Code does not support the position that Mr.
