There are no more CPU-consuming programming languages like VBScript or JScript that you have to learn or pay for. Macros are just short codes that you can write and execute in your favorite editor. You can use one or more Macros in your work. You can make macros for many different purposes. You can make macros for launching applications, opening documents, making file transfers, inserting pictures, pasting text, changing file paths, turning network shares on and off, and a lot more. Macros can be saved as templates and then reused. Macros can be connected to each other and trigger each other. Macros can be used to automate mundane tasks like opening programs, viewing files, typing text, and inserting content. Like macros, you can create scriptlets, which are short code sequences. You can use scriptlets to open documents, move files, do data entry, or any other task you can think of. You can save any scriptlet you create as a new template and then reuse it later. You can create multiple scriptlets that are triggered automatically when a certain event happens. You can also create custom functions like a function to copy text to the clipboard, and a function that sends an email. You can create endless numbers of functions that are triggered when an event happens. Macros can be 81e310abf
