In isolated sciatic nerve of rat, the effect of fentanyl (50 ng/ml) was studied on the conduction velocity, the refractory period, and the amplitude of motor and sensory potentials as function of the distance between stimulating and recording electrodes. The duration of action potentials was not significantly affected. At the intramuscular site, the peak amplitude of motor and sensory potentials were reduced to 50 and 20%, respectively. The conduction velocity was reduced to 40% of the control. The duration of refractory period was increased to 15%. The maximal effect was achieved within 30 min and the effect remained for the entire duration (at least 3 h) of exposure to fentanyl. The amplitude of action potentials in the myel
