Each IC typically has many external contacts, such as bond pads, ball pads, and pins, that are electrically connected to the functional and/or circuit elements. When an IC is packaged, one or more encapsulating materials, such as epoxy, cover the die and provide protection from damage and contamination. Electronic products, such as cell phones, smart phones, tablets, wearable devices, computers, automobiles, and the like, require large quantities of integrated circuits. For example, integrated circuits are frequently used in imaging devices, such as printers, scanners, televisions, etc., in storage devices, such as MP3 players, digital cameras, and video game consoles, and in wireless communications devices, such as cell phones, smart phones, and base stations. As consumer demand continues to grow, the demand for integrated circuits, especially integrated circuits used in the products listed above, will likely continue to increase. The integrated circuits used in these and many other types of products may be fabricated in large wafers. For example, a 150 mm diameter wafer may be used to fabricate 300 mm integrated circuits. ICs are also fabricated in other wafer sizes, such as 200 mm wafers and smaller wafers. Some wafers are cut into ICs prior to packaging. For example, a wafer may be singulated (
