While these kinds of missions would have long been relegated to the realm of science fiction, in 2011 the space race is over and we are on the brink of a new race – an unmanned orbital race. This race will be manned by robotic or automated vehicles that will be operated by, or in some cases by remote control. In the meantime, we still have the space shuttle which continues to fly the final mission, the final flight of the space shuttle program, before it is retired and deorbited in June. These unmanned vehicles will use some of the same technologies as their manned predecessors. However, they will be deployed in a much larger variety of missions. Some will be able to return imagery, others will be able to explore and sample the atmosphere of planets, while others will be able to change the orbits of artificial satellites. These new vehicles will also be able to perform research, enable navigation, enable communications and guide future missions. The revolution in space robotics will bring with it a revolution in communications. We have already seen communication satellites launched into orbit, communications satellites that link the world's land masses and satellites that allow us to communicate with each other from any location on Earth. But, that is only the beginning. As we learn how to construct robotic vehicles and communicate with them remotely from Earth, we will see them used in entirely new ways. The combination of these technologies is the foundation for a future that is full of the possibilities of space.
