I have been using a Mac for a few years now, but I have always been a Windows nerd. Also, in my previous post I briefly touched upon my opinion that Apple's 'flat' look was starting to become old and boring. As if to prove that flat and modernism in design are not the only way to go, Sony has just introduced a new line of sleek phones that will be supported by the Android OS. Sony a8es: First of all, the S-series will feature Windows Phone 8.1 but will be running on the newer Android 5.0 ("Lollipop"). In addition to a beautiful design, this phone will sport a 5.7 inch display, dual cameras at the back and an impressive battery capacity. Sony a7: The a7 will be the smaller sibling of the two phones above and will feature a 4 inch display and a 13MP camera at the back. This phone will also feature a smaller battery than the one in the a8. The Sony a7 will be priced at $399.

Of course, none of these phones will be the first ever smartphone designed and manufactured by Sony. But they do signal a turning point in the way the company looks, something that is in my opinion a big success for them. Not that the iPhone and its now rival Android are perfect in themselves, but the trend is definitely towards a more straightforward and stripped down design.If you could make a special edition of your favorite candy, what would you want to make? The Twisted Munchies team thought they'd see what the candy makers at Scharffen Berger would make if they took candy making to an extreme.
