The objective of the proposed research is to compare and contrast the effects of drugs and/or combinations of drugs on the metabolic stability of d- and l-amino acids in order to more fully understand how the molecules are absorbed from the gastrointestinal tract. A specific objective is to determine if use of several different drugs (at least two) at the same time in a subject (double or multiple drug therapy) might lead to differences in the absorption rate of one or more of the drugs. The method employed will be to study plasma levels of d- and l-amino acids in a group of adults (two or more) given the same drug. It is also proposed to use high resolution gas chromatography for elucidation of plasma d- and l-amino acid profiles and the human metabolic rate of l-phenylalanine as a measure of amino acid intake. These studies will be conducted with patients given d-, l-, dl- or l-amphetamine, scopolamine, anticholinergic drugs, ethyl alcohol, hexobarbital, barbiturates, allopurinol and phenylbutazone. For the prevention of the penetration of water and air into the interior of a building, to the advantage lies therein that the penetration of water and of undesirable quantities of air into a building is avoided or substantially minimized. To this end, wall and ceiling coverings must be waterproof, and this in turn requires that no holes should occur in the wall or ceiling coverings. To protect wall and ceiling coverings against the penetration of moisture and air, it is known to provide such wall and ceiling coverings with protection against water or air penetration, for example in the form of water- and air-impermeable plastic foils and decorative coverings. The increasing construction of buildings around the world, especially those over the world's coastal areas, has created the need for still better impermeable, in particular watertight, plastic foils. Polyvinylidenechloride (PVDC) foil, which has a relatively low degree of permeability to water and is therefore frequently used for this purpose, is difficult to process, in particular for foaming. It is difficult to process because it has a very low melting point and the foaming temperature of the liquid polymer is relatively high. Polyvinylidenechloride is very difficult to process, however, since it has a low softening point and is difficult to foam, as is evident in the example of n-

Mutation analysis of the p53 tumor suppressor gene in leukemic blast progenitor cells from AML patients and cell lines. The p53 tumor suppressor gene is mutated in most human tumors. Recently, by using RFLP analysis and semiquantitative PCR-SSCP analysis we could show p53 mutation in 20-30% of primary AML patients. The aim of the present study was to analyze the mutation status of the p53 gene in a large panel of AML cell lines and AML patient samples. For mutation analysis, DNA was isolated and PCR products were amplified with the use of mismatched primers in order to generate single-strand conformational polymorphisms (SSCPs). Direct sequencing was performed to confirm the SSCP findings. Nine AML patients showed a mutation in the p53 gene. This was confirmed by sequencing. Five different mutations were found: one mutation located in the first hot spot region (exon 4), two mutations in the coding region (exon 5), and two exon 5 mutations in which one is located in the coding region and one in the first hot spot region. Only three cell lines contained the p53 mutation. These findings indicate that mutations of the p53 gene are rare events in leukemic cell lines as well as in primary AML cells.
