order to make the operating system more secure. UAC is a powerful technology implemented to restrict the access of utilities until they are given the green light by a PC user with administrative privileges. As the number of devices, for example tablets, TVs, Blu-ray players, game consoles, smart TV, smartphones, and laptops, increases, the amount of connected devices in your home is growing exponentially, with up to 30% of home network traffic being from connected devices. Here are four important questions to ask yourself before connecting your devices to your home network. Is your device capable of connecting to a network? Connecting to a network means that your device supports a network connection and requires a user name and password. How secure is your connection? Security is an important aspect in selecting the right kind of device. A secure connection means that your device should be capable of identifying the network that you're connected to, either by using a WEP or WPA/WPA2 network encryption type, and that the device should require a password to be connected. How fast is your connection? If you are planning on streaming content like video or music, you may want to consider your device's connection speed in determining which type of network to use, so that you don't overburden the network. What type of device are you connecting? You can connect multiple kinds of devices to a network, but each one of them should meet certain requirements. Depending on the device type, the amount of hardware in the device and the amount of data that the device would transfer during use, a Wi-Fi network connection may or may not be the best choice for that particular device. If you are running a home network, Wi-Fi is generally the best choice, especially if the amount of
