The Silver Games is the company founded by Carter Chevalier and Chris Hennigan to produce a platform game targeted at people with visual and hearing disabilities. The studio consists of several members from the Deaf and Hard of Hearing Club of Hack Reactor. The idea of the game came about in a board meeting to discuss the setting for the next game. It was decided to cast the studio's vision with the aim of blending the narrative freedom of the world of fantasy with the visual and auditory familiarity of a platform game. The first step towards the design of the game was to make a list of the many challenges we would need to solve in order to make a game that will be enjoyable to all players, for all disabilities. Offering the best platform-adventure games and puzzle games to all gamers! The point you make about the launch date has been re-enforced so much by example this week. A week ago we were demoing for press etc, it took three hours for another demo to get done. It took 1 hour and a half to get done in the end. We turned half the game and got it ready for launch.

We should have finished it yesterday if we had done the first one properly. The next on our list of priorities is making the art good enough to get the game accepted on Appstore/Google Play. Then we can start on paying the bills. Still want to make a great game as always. Hello! Wouldn't it be better to do an Open Beta? I mean, I did a closed one of my game "Let's Cardboard RPG" and it was far better than the main release. Also, would it be possible to play the game before you release the game, it would be cool for us as it will save a lot of money. Supporting the game development through the early access is very effective, we've been supporting indie games by getting them to a point where they're ready to be released on the market, but they still lack some graphics, and the sound effects are not perfect, however we can still play and give feedback The main goal of early access is to get feedback from the players, and to see how easy it is for them to play the game. Releasing the early access is only to support the development of the game as it is still a work in progress. So you can say that the early access is a sales tool. If you release the

What's new in Alexei Run:

Control and Menace in the Power Play By Electro-communications regulators turn to open market for more spectrum by deregulating wireless carriers. That leaves regulators offering those carriers the chance to sell off spectrum fast. In fact, the FCC estimates the number of net new licenses will be zero. "Over the next few years, the country will fund its spectrum needs through a combination of auctions and support from license-holders" (Dec. 23, 2007). If you think the number of wireless carriers is rising fast, you're wrong. T-Mobile has added 83 towers to reach 200,000 subscribers last year (Jan. 17, 2008). Capri IAM is short on cash and looks to private equity. Short on cash? No, it's short on spectrum. And it may get even tighter as regulators consider deregulating the radio spectrum to pay for communications infrastructure and gear. Is T-Mobile going to auction off, or assign, its excess spectrum? After mostly using that spectrum for testing, Mayfield agrees T-Mobile will most likely sell off the excess spectrum (or may assume the spectrum was no longer cost-effective for its uses). T-Mobile has done the same as Verizon Wireless did last year, relying more on millimeter wave spectrum reserved for unlicensed uses. Bandwave thinks this is a mistake. Mayfield thinks ultimately a private equity group will step in and take the company private. T-Mobile, which has made strenuous efforts to succeed in wireless markets--it sees itself as an alternative to networks controlled by the established telcos--is awfully underfunded. The carrier's cash position is at less than half the industry standard of spending on debt and leases. T-Mobile could go bankrupt. Private equity, with its pension fund investors buying debt, is where the money is now, says the Aug. 2 (Wraytag) article, "Breaking the Tower Install-Talk Blockade." Expert: Spectrum is now free and it'll be auctioned off, not assigned, says Wraytag. Industry: Regulators believe all the spectrum can be leased. The Washington Post (Nov. 27, 2007) has a lengthy section

"Tales of a Demagogue in Exile." It reports: "FCC chairman Kevin Martin, predicting the agency will set aside about $30 billion of the $99 billion requested by the wireless industry to acquire spectrum for next-generation mobile services, called the latest round of bidding 'the next
