As CAD started to gain a foothold in the manufacturing industry, the company created a drawing editor and was able to compete with other companies, such as U.S. Steel, which was using data-flow drafting. This was the first version of AutoCAD: In addition to a native front-end and a set of primitive drawing commands, it offered data-driven drafting features such as cut, bend, and sweep operations. AutoCAD 1.0 was released on December 12, 1982, and was used on minicomputers. That same year, AutoCAD was ported to the Apple II and Tandy graphics terminals, and the following year, on May 2, 1983, it was ported to the IBM PC. AutoCAD 1.1 was released on September 27, 1983, and brought the drawing command set up to date. It also added an Inventor 3 and an AutoPlane product. When released in 1984, AutoCAD was the first native-PC CAD program to be widely adopted in the industry. For the next seven years, every company in every industry used AutoCAD as a design tool, including U.S. Steel. Since its inception, AutoCAD has grown and evolved with the needs of CAD users. In 1985, AutoCAD 2.0 was introduced with a modern interface, an optimized set of tools, and the ability to export files to the laser- and ink-jet printers used in the industry. AutoCAD 2.5 was released on December 12, 1990, and was the first of many updates that included 3-D capabilities and further improvements to the CAD drawing command set. At the time of its release, it supported Windows 3.1 and the 3-D modeler and renderings features. In 1994, AutoCAD 3.0

Sweet treats for a special birthday The law governing federal food-safety officials' ability to crack down on tainted foods is changing. For the first time, government inspectors will be allowed to seize tainted products and detain those in possession of them, according to a proposal released by the Department of Health and Human Services on June 9. Inspectors currently can only issue citations and allow tainted products to be destroyed. The proposed change is intended to bring the agency in line with the Food and Drug Administration, the agency most often targeted by food safety officials. Both are part of the Department of Health and Human Services. While the Food and Drug Administration can demand that a person surrender products that were tainted, they cannot seize the items. This has meant that even if a product is tainted, the person in possession of it is not subject to arrest. The law also requires that the Food and Drug Administration take responsibility for cases involving recalled products. It is unclear whether the agency currently is required to do so. The proposal follows widespread attention to the recalls of pet food products that contained tainted chicken in 2006 and 2007. The agency will continue to evaluate the proposal and to consult with Congress. The proposal will be considered by the Food and Drug Administration's Advisory Committee on Contaminants and Toxic Substances. According to the proposal, federal inspectors would be able to conduct "in-person inspections of establishments and individuals." The agency would still use warrant-less searches only in cases involving imminent danger. In addition, the agency would be able to order a recall of products that were adulterated, or falsely labeled. The proposals do not specify how many recalled products would need to be ordered. The agency also would be able to order the destruction of products that were adulterated, or falsely labeled, as well as any contaminated food. The change was prompted by a spike in the number of recalls of food products, which often is the result of a law called the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act. In the first six months of 2010, the number of recalls was up 23 percent, according to federal data. In the same period in 2009, there were 5,012 recalls.
