This invention relates to the replacement of an existing natural gas cylinder valve with an electronic one. In this age of concern for, and in many cases outright fear of, flammable gas leaks, it is becoming increasingly difficult for the typical gas consumer to secure both cylinder valves for his family. Once a consumer has selected his cylinder valve and gas meter, a highly trained technician usually installs the valve on the gas line under the supervision of a utility representative. The consumer must wait several weeks or even longer to receive his new valve, during which time he has no way to verify that the valve is working properly. The present invention will allow an ordinary consumer to buy a replacement cylinder valve without delay. The consumer will be able to substitute his selected cylinder valve for the one he has been using for years without any gas service interruptions. The installation of the present invention is normally performed by a trained gas meter technician in a period of hours, and in most cases will require no special tools. In the prior art there have been various suggestions of providing a gas valve which can be installed in place of an existing one. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 2,736,124 to Lautt discloses a gas valve which has a number of parts to be installed into an existing valve body and which includes a lock device for locking in place after it has been installed. While the Lautt valve appears to be designed to be installed directly into an existing gas line, there is no teaching of how to install the present invention without interfering with the gas line. Thus, it appears that the Lautt valve is installed by first making a hole in the gas line, using a boring bar, and then trying to insert the Lautt valve into the hole. In the present invention, no hole need be made in the gas line. Moreover, Lautt does not address the problem of how to provide means for opening and closing the valve. U.S
