The technology used to drive this gameplay is a combination of a number of technologies that utilise real-life motion capture data from players of all shapes and sizes, as well as advanced 3D reconstruction, machine learning, artificial intelligence and analysis of data to create a fluid experience. Players will engage in matches in the most realistic way possible. For example, when heading the ball, players will see the trajectory of the ball for as long as they are tracking the ball. By being able to see the trajectory of the ball, players will be able to better anticipate the path of the ball and react more naturally to it. Because of the 3D analysis of the data, players will feel more comfortable, less exposed, and finally become better at something that they did not think they were bad at. They will engage with other players and opponents in more natural ways, making them feel more natural and natural reactions. The reactions of other players to a situation will not be random, and the players will not engage in a mindless or random counter-attack, but will make unpredictable decisions. Interactions with certain players will not be random. When an opponent is controlling the ball, players will attempt to control the opponent more, instead of rushing in and trying to win it for themselves. What this means is that if you are controlling the ball, you will see the movement of your opponents and make decisions that ensure you are best positioned to succeed. Unlike the old game, the players in FIFA will not run as they try to keep control of the ball, and they will not push the opponent away like a friend, but will attempt to win the ball back for their team, creating a more unpredictable style of play. By being able to see what the passable area is of the pitch, players will better anticipate the movements of the opponents and make smarter decisions for their team. For example, a player who wants to pass the ball through a corner to a teammate will not simply take a shot at the ball, as that would give away their position. He will choose a pass route that allows him to move in and out of trouble, creating a natural pass route, much like the game of tennis. When another player is controlling the ball, if they evade to a safe area, the player will drift out to the edge and move towards the player trying to move in. This will make it more difficult for
