.26. 1 :iG.. What would you do if you had to make a life or death decision every time you got in the car? Imagine that. Helen Jewett was a mid-1800s prostitute, a madam, and the mistress of the infamous "Black Jack" Ketchum, a territorial marshal of Wyoming. She lived in a three story brothel, near the corner of Broadway and Pine. She was arrested for good reason. She was a madam, a corrupt businesswoman, and an accomplice of the formidable "Black Jack" Ketchum. In 1851, she was tried for murder and acquitted after a highly controversial trial. It was one of the first to feature live word-of-mouth telegraph service. In fact, the guilty verdict was issued faster than the telegraph could relay the news from the courtroom. Know of anything interesting about George Washington? We might publish it in our Daily Life Message. Send your information to: Life@ap.org. If you've lived in the US for a long time, you probably heard of Helen Jewett. Her brothel, fronting Broadway and Pine, on the corner of a busy corner in the middle of Manhattan's business district, made a famous brothel of the 1800s. About two miles south on Broadway at Prince Street, at the Fifth Avenue corner, is another structure that was the subject of another infamous trial. In 1835, a young man named Robert McPhail, age 17, was convicted of the murder of Thomas Bell, a waiter in the cellar of an inn next door. McPhail was a rather "interesting" young man. He was a veteran of the U.S. military. McPhail's father was reportedly a veteran of the American Revolution who died as a captain in the War of 1812. Robert McPhail was a spy for the United States government. He was apparently doing a good job of it, but his activities were discovered. McPhail was arrested by the U.S. Marshal and eventually convicted of murder. He was sentenced to be hanged. On the same day that McPhail was sentenced, a newspaper in New York City published a sensational news item. On the front page of The Evening Star was a story headlined "Something Has Happened." The story had a sub-heading - "An Important e79caf774b

by New York Daily News / June 26, 2001 Fifty years ago, Helen Jewett was a sick young prostitute living at home with her parents. She was passed out drunk when the news of the elopement of her older sister, Helen, and Albert Winchell broke. She was no saint, but Helen, as she then was, was a victim of her surroundings in a tough section of the city. But she was also a cunning girl. She was no ordinary harlot. She was "the Queen of the street," had admirers of every stripe and dreamed of becoming a movie star. She studied D. W. Griffith and starred in her first film as a debutante in a 1914 hit, "When a Man Marries." One of those men was a cop named Isaac Barnett -- a distinction with her that she couldn't have gotten away with today. As one newspaper phrased it, "He was a clean-cut young man and her type." Like Cagney, she made use of the tabloids to get attention. The 16-year-old runaway became a police sensation. The Patrolmen's Benevolent Association, in putting out a picture of her, found it was a major help in the recruiting drive. Get the facts... and the slang of the day. Ridder Street, in the heart of old city, was the center of a thriving underworld. Mile Zero on the Lower East Side was a focal point of the area. It was there that the Mafia set up shop -- and a bustling business it was. Prostitution had always been illegal, but in the 1880s, a fearful Public Health Commission of New York City passed the Morals and Health Code. As the price of a prostitute's favors fell from 10 to 25 cents to a dime, the Coney Island area became the second major center of prostitution in the city, right behind Manhattan. On Wilson Avenue, at the corner of East Greene Street in East New York, a minor mobster named William "Bugs" Moran ran a speakeasy and brothel. His daughter, Lem Young, was the prot'g' of Helen Jewett's mobster father, Joseph. About 4 a.m. on March 13, 1912, Henry Billings -- a stableman who lived near the morgue on Willowemoc Avenue -- heard a cry and discovered a naked woman running past his house
