Search form Search Submitted by treacher on Sun, 11/29/2011 - 11:13 Street Gangs and Nigerian Diplomacy You might think that the streets are not a good place for diplomacy. But one of the founders of the Harvard Center for African Studies saw differently. "I did not think the streets were good for professional diplomacy," said H. Jefferson Morse, the great diplomat and Africanist, in a 1996 Harvard Magazine article titled "For Street Gangs, Diplomacy Is All Business." "Nor did I think they were good for commercial diplomacy, but the streets were definitely good for grassroots diplomacy. The streets were good for understanding our culture, and for a people like the Nigerian street gang not to understand that culture meant they were ignorant of the culture of the people with whom they interacted. If you would make yourself more familiar with the people with whom you would negotiate by coming to know their culture, the people in the streets would think better of you." Morse's idea is that today's Africa is more complex and intertwined than ever before, and that Nigeria has an opportunity to lead the way in many ways. "Africa has become more important than ever to the world," he wrote in 1996, "and Nigeria is becoming more important than it has ever been. The rest of Africa will follow Nigeria's example." The establishment of diplomatic relations between the United States and Nigeria in 1959 was a historic diplomatic milestone. Since then, relations have become significantly more important as Nigeria's influence has begun to spread across the continent, encouraging neighboring African countries to follow its example. Indeed, Africa is "a dynamic, fast-moving region," according to Morse, and the "primary function of the United States and the other partners is to contain and assist in the development of the continent's natural resources and markets." "We believe our policy toward Nigeria, the continent and Nigeria as a partner is, and must be, aggressive," Morse wrote. "Nigeria's exposure is no longer limited to West Africa. The major oil producers in the Middle East are Nigeria's neighbors. Nigeria is now a member
