"Bipasha Basu & Lillete Dubey in Karisma Ki liad". Nov 25, 2013. Q: Algorithm to perform real-time list intersection? I'm using C# to create some basic multiplayer combat video games. I have a list of player positions(x and y) and I want to perform an "overlap test" for every player. I need to know which player(s) might overlap. One could run over all the x and y values at once and test if 2 points are in some way overlapping, but this is very inefficient - especially for a multiplayer game with a large number of players. I have come up with an algorithm to reduce the problem size to something more manageable: Each player in turn picks up the other players x and y coords. I create a list of player ids I've seen so far, and add both their x and y coords to this list. I create a new list with all coords that have not been added to this list so far. Sort the new list by player id, then by x. Now, I put my head down and add all new coords to this list. This method does work, but I wonder if there is some other method that works better? Does any one have any suggestions? (And what's more, other suggestions for creating multiplayer combat video games - I'm really interested in learning these things ;-)

A: If you want to minimize the impact on your servers, you should cache the near-duplicate players, and only perform the computation when an existing player changes. That way you only need to sort one item (the list of near-duplicates) on an insert/update rather than on a full query. You can use HashSet to ensure that the computation does not need to duplicate the data more than necessary. There are plenty of great teams out there and we don't think any manager would be going through a challenging time if he's got enough of a squad to cope. But if you look at a place like Italy and the kind of team they have then Arsene Wenger is in a
