Black Cat. The name alone elicits an unpleasant sensation in players because of its association with Disney's 1984 horror flick The Black Cat starring Bette Midler and Annette Bening. In both the film and the game, black cats are used as deadly thieves who operate in the shadows. But Black Cat is more of a stealth game than a horror game. The player character is a cat burglar who travels through the game's seven levels and must avoid lethal traps set by a variety of characters in order to claim money that they can later use to buy things. One of the most peculiar aspects of Black Cat is that the game can never end because the playable character is a cat. As such, if you die or fall off a cliff, you simply begin again at the last position you were in before your fall. But you can be carried forward by your cat friends, and even give them a boost up by using magic to teleport them higher, which is the only reason to take them along with you into situations where they can't possibly benefit you. The player earns gold pieces by taking objects (which are usually keyed to doors) from people's homes, thus enabling them to enter those homes. The more money the player takes, the more advanced objects he will be able to purchase. Of course, if a character does have a life bar, any additional damage done to them will eventually result in a death. Even though the player cannot kill characters, he can damage them severely enough to render them unconscious which will generally allow the player to access their homes without causing any ill consequences. If he enters a character's home by mistake, he may also find something to steal. If he takes a bribe, it will unlock a different section of the home so that you can look for a specific item or object. Every character in the game has a life bar, but it is important to note that the life bar is not the same for every character. The concept is borrowed from the Monkey Island games. Some characters only have a 2/3 life bar; others have a 4/3 bar; still others have a 6/3. Only the most deadly characters such as Policeman 3, 7, and 9 will have a 9/3 life bar, and most of these characters are actually available early on in the game when the player may yet be dealing with less-deadly characters. The cat burglar has the ability to stealthily approach any character,

This game takes that a step further. How? By introducing interplay between the player and his opponent, for starters. Only cards that can be interacted with are given to the player. Some cards have special abilities, and many can be used for things other than a battle. Your hand size grows, for example, and the number of cards you can play increases. Play your cards in a certain order, depending on your card's abilities and their positions in your deck. As you play and lose or win a battle, your cards gain or lose cards, and in the end you are awarded points according to your battle record.It is a game for 2 or more players in which you aim to gain the most points by playing cards, also called "chips", in a given time-frame, during which you can use any number of your own cards. The card game invites you to play each card just once per game, to test its effect in a battle. You can play any card at any time as long as it is not a battle card.Each turn, a player collects the cards he wants to play and plays them in a battle. If the player plays a battle card, he is at the opponent's mercy. The player who first makes contact with the opponent, which is usually the one who plays a battle card, loses. Players may choose to be either an aggressor or a defender in the first phase of the game.The title of the game refers to the cards you use for a battle. The title is in the format "Attack:" followed by the name of the battle card, for example, "Attack: Cast A Monster". If a player attacks with his own battle card, the player chooses a monster to play. You do not select from among the ones in your deck; they will be randomly drawn from the deck of your opponent.If the player
