After more than 30 years of government, including the Department of Homeland Security, the Santa Clara, Calif., networking equipment maker now sells to other government agencies, and also to countries outside the United States. Cisco has been the go-to federal vendor for secure communications equipment for the U.S. government for two decades. The company is a leader in systems that secure e-mail, mobile devices, and voice communications. Last year, the company announced a new program that provided Secure Voice over IP, or S-Vop, offering technology and services that allow government to protect its vital communications systems and sensitive information. Cisco's newer programs for international customers expand an existing program for doing business in Europe. This summer, it began to sell systems and services in countries such as the U.K., Australia, Singapore, Ireland and New Zealand. These countries provide telecommunications infrastructure for international trade, transportation and financial services. It's an important market for Cisco, which says it supplies 15,000 technology-dependent companies outside the United States. "It's one of the most important in the world," says Jason Morrow, director of Cisco's Channel Sales Office, which handles sales to companies and agencies. "We're talking to about 30 to 40 of them." Now the company is also expanding into the health sector. Last month, Cisco acquired a company called Padgett Technologies, a health-care systems provider based in Buffalo, N.Y. Cisco plans to use the company's technology to help care for people in the aftermath of a major disaster or war. "What we're doing with Padgett is very similar to what we do with the government," Morrow says. "We're working with the federal, state, local, territorial governments, with the public health systems and the private sector on creating a better infrastructure for all of the health systems needs that will be needed in the aftermath of a major catastrophe." Penetrating the corporate market Cisco has both technology and services in store for
