Ceftriaxone, a beta-lactam antibiotic effective against various Gram-negative bacteria, was found to be guite effective against Toxocara canis in vitro. The resistance of T. canis to ceftriaxone was lower than that of other parasites such as Giardia lamblia and Entamoeba histolytica, while it was higher than that of Trichomonas vaginalis. This is the first report on the effects of ceftriaxone on non-Gram-negative bacteria. Kinetics of uptake, binding and efflux of [14C]-ceftriaxone was studied in isolated brush border membrane vesicles (BBMV) from the intestine of T. canis. Four different antibiotic-sensitive transport systems (Lis type) were identified in T. canis. The uptake of ceftriaxone by these systems was saturable and the highest K(m) values were observed in the BBMV from the intestine (K(m)=0.32-0.71 microM), followed by the BBMV from the brain (K(m)=2.57-9.44 microM), and the system in the eggs (K(m)=2.52-10.0 microM). The uptake of ceftriaxone was stimulated by outwardly directed Na+ gradients and inhibited by inwardly directed Na+ gradients. Ceftriaxone competitively inhibited the uptake of several substrates for the T. canis BBMV and other BBMV. The BBMV from different isolates of T. canis (ex
