I'm using the Pipeline plugin for pipeline builds/steps). My issue is this: the whole Jenkins setup is cached to be able to save the state of the server (which has a relatively large history of builds, about a month of history at this point). On a restart I'd like to be able to restore the "entire project" rather than running a build, which may take a long time (e.g. not actually checkout the latest code). Can I configure Jenkins so that when I restart the server I get a fresh start (without having to go through the'restore' process)? What are the options? A: Try to use job with single project (i.e. rest-restoration). It will restart the job without rebuilding any files, making it very fast. More info can be found in Jenkins wiki and here. A: In case of a master-slave setup and several jobs that are built on the master the slave should not perform a checkout/build every time master restarts. Jenkins has a feature called "preserve files" that allow to save the state of the slave. After the master is restarted a second time Jenkins can restore all projects from the file system by checking out the slave workspace and running the steps of the job. This feature (when set to preserve files) is enabled via the CONSOLE or GUI in Jenkins configuration and can be configured for all or individual jobs

The letter requests documents the Department of Justice (DOJ) has failed to comply with and raises serious concerns about documents it had promised to produce pursuant to Committee subpoena in October and January. Chairman Grassley, Ranking Member Feinstein, and Committee members have repeatedly called for documents and records demonstrating the process for reviewing, compiling and assessing Special Counsel Robert Mueller's final report and accompanying exhibits, and for the independence of the FBI and DOJ. The Committee has been aware of a highly detailed list of requests related to those issues from Acting Attorney General Whitaker that were not fulfilled and that the Committee had sent a subpoena seeking the same materials. The current letter is the most recent demand in a series
