Based on the inspiring SELF-HEALING principle: The human body has its own strength and resilience in illness, but should be a "WILD WOMAN" with various treatments as much as possible. Contact us to find out more about self-healing, self-recovery and eradication. Just refer to the website, you will find a lot of information about us. Many medics and naturopaths agree that the medical system is too violent and invasive, it's often time-consuming and expensive. We need to find other ways to help patients, prevent and cure diseases. Especially for the young, Self-Healing doesn't mean you don't seek help from the medical department. However, it's more important to accept the disease as it occurs, keep a healthy lifestyle, and apply alternative treatments (such as acupuncture, moxibustion, reiki, homeopathy, etc.). You should also pay attention to the treatment program, try to meet other people, get out of the house and into the fresh air as much as possible. The best cure for disease is to prevent them from happening in the first place. I recommend the following herbs for general health: Wild ginseng root Ginseng is to prevent them from happening in the first place. Owning and picking up a still early build of Windows 8.1, we're really liking the new and improved Start screen. Seriously. The new Start screen (that's what Microsoft calls it) is an immense improvement over the Windows 8 Start menu. First, it's really big. We have no idea where it will stop. It has plenty of room for big tiles and full-blown apps. Windows 8.1 Start screen image courtesy: Windows Blog Some of the tiles are clickable now. We're not sure how useful this is -- perhaps you want to watch a video rather than say, Microsoft's huge Bing search logo tile? The new Start screen and desktop are fairly similar to each other. They both feature the same Windows Live and Skype integration as Windows 8, and they each have an app bar in the lower left corner, complete with Search, Start, and the like. The Start menu, on the other hand, looks nothing like the Start screen, except for the fact that you can click on the Start menu link in the Start screen and reach the familiar menu. At the moment, you can't even get to the Start menu from the Start screen (with no sign of this changing any time soon). You must head directly to the Start screen if you want to use the familiar Start menu. Both start screens are actually fairly consistent. On the desktop, you get a Start menu; on the start screen, you get the Start screen, you get the Start screen using the on-screen keyboard, and even access the Start menu if you swipe from the right edge.) Not that you'll have any trouble figuring out the start screen, once you see it. Like the Windows 8 Start screen, Windows 8.1's home screen is just that -- a homescreen. You can add app tiles to that homescreen and re-arrange them to suit your needs. You can have a background image, just like in Windows 8, or keep it placid and simple. Windows 8's Start screen, on the other hand, is more like a dashboard. You get one screen for everything, with that great Windows 8 "live tile" powering up every tile on the Windows 8 Start screen. You can't really get rid of that tile, and you ca
