The U.S. government's new $1 trillion stimulus package includes $210 million to improve communications and computer technology infrastructure in underserved communities. The Recovery Act Task Force on Education, Labor, Health and Human Services, Public Safety and Justice, and Veterans Affairs announced the $210 million in grants Monday. The grants, in the form of competitive grants, will be distributed through each department. "Communications technology and information infrastructure are critically important for education, job training, public safety and community development," said Task Force Chair Rep. John W. Campbell, R-Irvine. "This important piece of legislation will strengthen community-wide networks that can help establish a foundation for a stronger economy and brighter future." The grants will go to schools, libraries, community centers, non-profit organizations, rural health centers, community colleges, businesses, libraries, and law enforcement agencies. They will be used to improve communications and information technology (CIT), internet access, broadband access, and computers. The grants can be used to purchase equipment, develop technology projects and provide technology resources to businesses. Additionally, the grants will be used to leverage federal funding and assist local agencies in attaining access to broadband and broadband training. The Technology Innovation Reform Act was signed into law earlier this month, by President Obama 648931e174
