To determine whether peristaltic motion can modulate the propagation of antral contractions, antral phasic pressure was recorded by force transducers inserted into the antrum of conscious dogs and dogs prepared for a chronically implanted catheter in the left common iliac artery. Interdigestive contractions were marked by the development of interdigestive pressure waves in the phasic pressure recordings. The time interval between contractions, known as the peristaltic period, was estimated by the characteristic signal of peristaltic waves. After recording manometric records in fasted animals, intravenous or intracaudal administration of exogenous gastrin-releasing peptide (LSD) known to increase peristaltic frequency induced an effect similar to feeding in inducing a marked increase in the duration of interdigestive contractions and their propagation. We next decided to determine whether the increase in the number of peristaltic waves in the recording during the fed state was related to an increase in interdigestive pressure waves. This was accomplished by measuring the amplitude of the first peristaltic wave in each record of fed animals. The amplitude of the first peristaltic wave of each record was significantly greater in the fed state ( $n = 11$ ) than in the fasted state ( $n = 9$ ). However, within the fed state, the increase in amplitude was significantly lower during the first record than in the second or third record. We conclude that the increase in
