Is there any difference between getting a resource in normal execution and loading a resource in a class method? A: Classes may load resources. For example, you can load a resource through a static method:

InputStream resource =
MyClass.class.getResourceAsStream("myres.txt");

Whether your program is running normally or as part of a classloader, you don't access any resources directly. The above code checks which classes you have access to, and then looks up the resource in the class's resources directory. We have recently developed a mammalian model of inflammation in the eyelid using the mouse orbital injection model. This model was developed specifically to allow the analysis of the orbital space and it is our proposed Specific Aim to adapt this model to evaluate the effects of clinical and experimental interventions aimed at reducing the inflammatory response to ocular surgery or infection. A primary goal of this model is to develop a means of quantitatively detecting ocular inflammation in the postoperative or post-infectious patient. Specific Aim 1 will investigate optimal injection methodologies and route of injection for producing a model of acute inflammation for this model. This will be done by injecting inflammatory agents into the pre-

surgical or post-surgical orbital space
