The researchers propose to develop an additional two microarrays to be used for the quality control of array data. One array has known high-quality, established real-time control (QC) probes, and the second array has the low-quality Probeset QC (PQC) probes. Both arrays are complementary. While the QC array can detect outliers as well as many of the systematic errors typical of arrays (e.g., capturing and hybridization problems, etc.), it has the limitation that only large numbers of spots can be assayed. The PQC array is targeted at smaller scales, and is intended to detect systematic flaws such as array deterioration. This improvement is necessary to fill a gap where there is an absence of the requisite quality control. The use of this array will provide critical information regarding the reliability and robustness of microarray-based measurements. It is also important to perform QC of experiments that are not on the more expensive arrays. The proposed array uses common software such as
