1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to surface texture analysis for cosmetic and other materials, and more specifically to surface texture analysis for spray-on cosmetics and other cosmetics that are applied to the skin. 2. Description of the Related Art For decades, cosmetic products have been coated on the skin to change the appearance of the skin. For example, lipstick has been used to make the lips darker. The traditional method for determining an appropriate color of lipstick was to apply the lipstick to a human model's lips in the presence of a doctor and then remove the lipstick for a final judgment of whether or not the lipstick was acceptable to the doctor. This was a trial and error method that resulted in much time and effort spent by the cosmetic industry and the subject of the lips. Over time, the test became very unreliable for a variety of reasons including that the doctor could misinterpret the look of the lips based on factors other than the lipstick, the doctor could be motivated to select the best looking lipstick for the subject, the subject could be "faking" the lip color in order to improve the appearance of their lips, and the subject could be presenting variations of the same look to the doctor. In light of the above, many professional and lay experts still rely on the lip swatch that was traditionally used to determine the proper color of lipstick for a given subject. A lip swatch is a small portion of the subjects lips that is visually compared to the color of a lipstick. Lip swatches have been conventionally used as a reference to determine the color of a lipstick. For example, a lipstick of the same color, i.e. the same shade, may be compared to a different lipstick that is perceived by the user as being similar in color, i.e. the same shade. Accordingly, an experienced user of lipstick determines the shade of the lipstick based on the similarities and differences among similar lipsticks. The user may make reference to a color chart, which shows the color of a particular lipstick in comparison to other similarly colored lipsticks. The user then selects a lipstick having the same color as, i.e. the same shade of, the desired lipstick. While the above process is relatively straightforward for professional lipstick users, especially those users with extensive training in color, the process is laborious for non-professional users, such as, for example, a family with young children or a professional lipstick user with limited training in the proper use of color. As a result, traditional methods are impractical. bff6bb2d33

Citric acid supplementation in the diet improves lactation performance of dairy cows in early lactation. In this study, we evaluated the effect of citric acid supplementation in the diet on milk yield, quality, and dry matter intake (DMI) of dairy cows in early lactation. Thirty-six multiparous cows were used in a randomized block design with four treatments and a 2 × 2 factorial arrangement of treatments: control diet (C) (10.2% crude protein, 1.18 Mcal/kg net energy of lactation [NE]), supplemented with 0.2% (S0.2) or 0.4% (S0.4) citric acid; and control diet plus 0.4% (S0.4) citric acid during the lactation stages (CS0.4). The experiment was carried out using a Latin square design, where each cow was the experimental unit in two 4-wk periods. In total, 30% of daily DMI was randomly allocated between morning and afternoon feeding times. The diet was formulated to meet the nutrient requirements of the Brazilian Regulation of Animal Handling (Protocol No. 006/04 of the American Society of Agricultural and Biological Engineering). The milk yield was increased (P 0.05), but total intake tended to increase as dietary acidity increased. Citric acid supplementation did not affect pregnancy rates; however, fertility was only achieved in cows fed a diet supplemented with citric acid. In summary, dietary supplementation of 0.2% and 0.4% citric acid throughout the lactation increased milk yield, milk fat concentration, and milk citric acid concentration and resulted in improved milk quality in the early lactation stages. These results indicated that citric acid supplementation in the diet of dairy cows in early lactation may be beneficial, not only in improving the nutritional value of the milk of cows in early lactation, but also in maintaining or improving fertility.

Aquarium Corrupts Anybody Out ThereNORFOLK, VA – Hampton Roads' Military Alcohol Awareness Program (MAP) is still on hiatus, after they got temporarily shut down by the Naval Command Medicine Evaluation Board after a 2012 incident. Details on why this happened, and what led the board to shut them down have been somewhat vague. In 2012, at Northern Virginia VAMC, a reservist medical orderlies was found in a compromising position between two female patients, one of them a naval officer. In 2013, the same naval officer was found passed out with female patients in a hospital room. Further investigation during 2012 and 2013 from Naval Command Medical Evaluation Board reveals that Naval Special Warfare, and the Naval Special Warfare medical training centers, are responsible for the lapses. This is not an isolated event, but nor does it seem to be unique to the Navy. In 2014, Naval Command Medical Evaluation Board reinitiated their investigation into training centers and submariner. They established an Alcohol Awareness Awareness Committee, where the board met with representatives from Navy Recruiting, Retention, AND planning in the Norfolk area. One of the problems was the Navy designates these recruiters as the Marine Corps recruiters, and as such, the Navy does not have experience with how to successfully operate recruiters in sensitive environments. Naval Command brought in recruiters with the Marine Corps, just to find out that the Marine Corps used different recruiters, just north and south of the Naval Training Station, several miles apart. The problem continued to be not being able to properly understand the recruiting environment at the Norfolk Naval Training Center. So much so that the Norfolk Naval Training Station Commanding Officer, 2nd Fleet Commander, and his staff went back to recruiting as it was when the Marine Corps took over the recruiting function at the Naval Training Center. The problem with that is that recruiting is not the same as it was when the Marine Corps took over recruiting. The reason the recruiting environment is so different is because now it is located at
