How to solve PDF crack errorThe invention concerns a device for the entrapment of fish to be retained in a retention area on or in the water. The device is attached to a fishing rod and, as soon as the fishing rod is inserted in the water, an inflatable device is activated and holds the fish. It is known that when a fish has been hooked and is struggling with the rod in the water, it may be crucial to find a good position to release the fish on the rod so that the fish can then swim away. Another problem of an angler is to keep his hooked fish for as long as possible. Thus, the angler looks for a good place to put the fish down in case the fish leaps and runs away. This happens frequently. Furthermore, another disadvantage of an angler is that it is not possible to observe the situation from a distance, in particular if the person operating the device is behind the angle of the fishing rod. WO 99/05408 describes a device by means of which a fishing rod is inserted in the water and the hook is pushed into a tube until the fish is held in a transparent sheet bag. The purpose of this device is to release the fish immediately, a well known method by which one can avoid serious injuries to the fish and to the angler. In this way the hooked fish is transferred from the water where it is struggling to the bag where it stays until it is released by the angler. This bag with the fish in it is then returned to a separate container in which it is transferred to the angler or to another container, since the bag cannot be disposed of directly in the river or sea. In a device described in U.S. Pat. No. 3,301,414, the fish is held for the same purpose in a bag and the bag is connected to the end of a rod. This bag is released and the fish falls to the water surface and swims away. There are also other known devices for the entrapment of fish to be retained in a retention area in or on the water. However, these known devices differ in at least one of the following ways from the device of the invention: the device is not attached to a fishing rod in such a manner that it can be easily used when fishing with such a rod is desired. the device does not contain a mechanism for attaching it to the fishing rod in such a manner that the device is most effectively placed to automatically detain the fish
