A: Windows uses a process of checking all the installed software in its database to see if the software is digitally signed. If not, it will disable that software as a safety measure to prevent it from being used by malicious software. Most likely, the data recovery software was not digitally signed by a vendor known to Microsoft, so they wouldn't allow it to work. These are the steps you need to take in order to fix it: In Start menu, click on "Control Panel" Click on "Uninstall a Program" from the left-hand side menu. A window will open. Select "Programs and Features" from the left-hand menu. Select "Windows" from the left-hand menu. Click on "Uninstall a program" under the Windows heading. In the popup window, click "More details". Look for an entry titled "Microsoft Data Recovery". It will probably be under the Office heading. If you can't find it, you can manually search for it in the programs and features list. It could be under the "Miscellaneous" heading. Either way, when you find it, right-click on it and select "Uninstall". This will fix the problem. Then, restart your computer and try to run the data recovery software. If it's still not working, try again. If it still doesn't work, download this program:

2 . .rar .Q: How to make my own exception in C# I am trying to make my own exception in C#. I want it to return a decimal. For example, like so: public class

MyException : Exception{ private decimal myDecimal; public

MyException(string message){ myDecimal = 0; base.Message = message; }

public decimal MyDecimal{ get { return myDecimal; } } } A: There's no need to implement it using a new exception - just add a message property: public

class MyException : Exception{ private decimal myDecimal; public

MyException(string message){ myDecimal = 0; base.Message = message; }
```

public decimal MyDecimal{ get { return myDecimal; } } } A: The best way to create your own custom exception in C# is to derive from the

System.Exception. Based on your code above. public class MyException :
Exception { private decimal myDecimal; public MyException(string message) { myDecimal = 0; base.Message = message; } public decimal MyDecimal { get { return myDecimal; } } } } And then you can create your own exception like this:

var exc = new MyException("Some message"); Now, you would just need to throw the exception like this: throw exc; So in short, you shouldn't implement any custom exceptions yourself. A: You should really read the description on

MSDN of the Exception class. You are deriving 595f342e71
