The overall objectives of this application are to answer the questions: are maternal stresses during pregnancy detrimental to offspring, and does early postnatal stress have lasting effects on health outcomes in adulthood? To answer these questions, we use a novel experimental model in rats where maternal stress during pregnancy and lactation results in altered offspring behavior and gene expression in reward and stress-response circuits in adulthood. In addition, we use the natural variation of dam-rearing conditions in a rat colony at Washington State University as a model of maternal stress in rats to examine its effects on offspring physiology and behavior. Using this experimental model, we propose to test the following hypotheses: Specific Aim 1: Maternal stress during pregnancy and lactation has lasting effects on offspring hypothalamus-pituitary-adrenal (HPA) axis and brain gene expression that alter the brain-adrenal-tissue interaction during stress responses, and result in higher stress reactivity and higher pro-inflammatory cytokine levels. Specific Aim 2: Maternal stress during early postnatal (postnatal day 10, P10) stages of development alters the HPA axis,
